AS TONNAGE GROWS

Is Sure to Follow Better Facilities

QUESTIONS OF FREIGHT

Tonnage Will Follow the Avenues of Transportation, and no Avenue Means no Freight Will be Hauled—Some European Facts.

CINCINNATI, Ohio, July 4.—Increasing tonnage in an inevitable accompaniment of increased transportation facilities. There is no argument in the statement often made that the tonnage on the navigable rivers of the United States is insignificant. It is a statement of a fallacy. It is certain that tonnage will follow the avenue of transportation, as it is certain that where there is no avenue there can be no tonnage. There was no tonnage overland before the great railways were constructed, and even though it were true that the inland waterway is increasing volume with each year because of the cheapness, the certainty and the safety which waterway transportation always provides.

The inland waterway of Prussia unimproved and the same waterways improved show that tonnage inevitably follows the improved waterway. There could be no more striking illustration of the fact than the official figures submitted to the Prussian Diet during the course of the present year, and quoted by Consul General Guenther, of Frankfurt, in a recent report to the Department of Commerce and Labor. According to the figures presented to the Diet there were 9,828,363 metric tons carried on the Rhine in 1906. With the completion of the improvement of that river, there were 24,753,075 metric tons carried in 1907. On the Elbe there were carried 3,580,259 metric tons in 1906 and 7,362,500 in 1907. The Oder carried 1,409,731 metric tons in 1906 and 3,068,984 in 1907 while with the improvement of the "Waterways of the Mark" near Berlin, no less than 12,231,675 metric tons were carried through the locks of the improved waterway in that year—the first of the improvement.

The figures quoted from the report form a complete answer to the fallacious objection that the tonnage of the inland waterway is insignificant. Tonnage follows the improved inland waterway—and all experience demonstrates the fact. The advantages which trade and commerce possess in Prussia are in the fact that the improvement of the inland waterways of the Kingdom is begun and carried on under a definite plan as part of the fixed policy of the government, with appropriations for the work finding place in the annual appropriation budgets, not only without objection in the Diet but with commendation and appreciation of the immeasurable benefits to trade and commerce arising from the adoption of the system. That is the system advocated for the United States by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. It is the only system under which the work of improvement of waterways can be carried on and completed, and it is the system which has received the unqualified endorsement of the great commercial and industrial organizations of the country.
